

LONG STORY

REPORTAGE | TALKING POINTS | IDEAS | INSIGHT | THE BOTTOMLINE

WHAT TWEET FOR TAT TELLS YOU ABOUT RAHUL

Rahul Gandhi may have expressed regret to the SC, but data shows insults are crucial to virality and reach

JAYACHANDRAN/REUTERS

Joydeep Pal
feedback@livemint.com

On the evening of 11 April, as the first phase of India's general elections drew to a close, Samajwadi Party chief and former chief minister of Uttar Pradesh Akhilesh Yadav took to Twitter to reflect on the significance of humanity's first-ever snapshot of a black hole, which had been released to the public only a few hours ago. "Ato black hole bhi dikhi gaya. Bas achhe din hi jin jo nazar na hataiye [We have even seen a black hole now, but 'ache din' are still out of sight]," he wrote. Within minutes, that post, with one-tweet was retweeted thousands of times.

With Yadav you understand the actual significance of the black hole image or not, he does have a firm grip on one aspect of Indian politics: insults work. They have power. They can be useful. And they can inform a great deal about particular moments in politics.

This poll season, the Election Commission has been sent scrambling several times due to the use of insults—targeted at individuals, entire states, and even entire geographic regions (Bharatiya Janata Party president Amit Shah said it was difficult to make out who the Rahul Gandhi/Warangal rally happened in India or Pakistan). Why do politicians rely so often on insults? It is of course a guaranteed applause line at an election rally, garners instant media attention, and if one is lucky, perhaps some votes. But it is hard to quantify these effects—until now.

Most politicians these days are active on Twitter and often choose to bypass traditional media to connect with their constituents. Every tweet can be tagged and analyzed and tracked on metrics of virality. And a sample of every tweet since January 2017 (over 90,000 of them hand-coded for insults or confrontational language) by five top politicians—Prime Minister Narendra Modi, Amit Shah, Akhilesh Yadav, Rahul Gandhi, and Mamata Banerjee—throws up some interesting findings.

Insults clearly attract traction and politicians instinctively know it. On average, a tweet that includes an insult is significantly more likely to be retweeted, with retweet rates ranging from 32-10% higher than a normal retweet. Congress president Rahul Gandhi has become a master of the insult genre and his political makeover is closely tied in with an ability to insult effectively, which, data shows, began in earnest in the final months of 2017. Insulting insults is also a weapon of the opposition, as Akhilesh Yadav's transformation shows once he stopped being the Uttar Pradesh chief minister.

POLITICS OF NAME CALLING
The Indian political landscape, of course, has a long history when it comes to insults. During her early political career, former prime minister Indira Gandhi was dismissed as a "goongi gudya" (dumbbell). Modiji once called Sonia Gandhi a "jersey cow". And Modiji himself has been called everything from a merchant of death, but perhaps no other insult campaign has been as sustained and as politically effective as the derogative nickname for Rahul Gandhi—the "pappu" name person.

Akhilesh is the most adept at metaphor and turns of phrase. As a result, almost unnoticed, Akhilesh has emerged as a key oppositional voice in the Twittersphere during much of the 2014 general election campaign. The Congress thought that social media wasn't worth engaging in. Meanwhile, the cult of "pappu" was built into a powerful meme. Starting in 2013, even banal criticism of Modi would invite a furious backlash from the "pappu" brigade. And so it went.

During much of the 2014 general election campaign, the Congress thought that social media wasn't worth engaging in. Meanwhile, the cult of "pappu" was built into a powerful meme. Starting in 2013, even banal criticism of Modi would invite a furious backlash from the "pappu" brigade. And so it went.

Modiji's name has been derided the name of a statesman since becoming the Prime Minister of India, at least on Twitter. It is the second word of the BJP which has kept its Twitter blades sharpened. Rahul's aggressive debut in late 2017 also coincided with the opening of the floodgates into a new era of antagonistic political messaging on social media. All the major parties were then online, and many had realized their electoral prospects and brand images were sufficiently impacted by what happened on social media. Congress leaders joined Twitter on mass; Akhilesh joined from the "frontlines" of Congress politics, and West Bengal chief minister Mamata Banerjee moved to openly confronting Modi, and presenting herself as the consolidator of the regional challenge to the BJP regime.

REGIONAL SATRAPS?

Mamata has nearly two years focused significantly on potential allies in other parts of the country.

Mamata's "national ambitions" were ini-ting the insult campaign against Rahul has been BIP's biggest branding victory.

However, in terms of online visibility at least, Rahul began the competition having barely 2.48K tweets, established 14.93K known in political discourse on Twitter, belonging to both the BJP and the Congress, the Congress began to consistently talk about Rahul more than they were talking about Modi. More importantly, Rahul went from being mentioned by less than 10% of BJP politicians to consistently finding space in over half of the ruling politicians' tweets. And yet, he never became a derided, arguably even within his own party. Even in the first quarter of 2019, there were 46 different trending hashtags with "pappu" in them, and only one with "Rahul".

Modiji's name has been derided the name of a statesman since becoming the Prime Minister of India, at least on Twitter. It is the second word of the BJP which has kept its Twitter blades sharpened. Rahul's aggressive debut in late 2017 also coincided with the opening of the floodgates into a new era of antagonistic political messaging on social media. All the major parties were then online, and many had realized their electoral prospects and brand images were sufficiently impacted by what happened on social media. Congress leaders joined Twitter on mass; Akhilesh joined from the "frontlines" of Congress politics, and West Bengal chief minister Mamata Banerjee moved to openly confronting Modi, and presenting herself as the consolidator of the regional challenge to the BJP regime.

THE INSULT IS THE MESSAGE

CHART 1: Rahul Gandhi discovered an edgy, new side in late-2017. In the months since, nearly half of his tweets have included insulting or confrontational language.

Analysis based on a sample of 75,000 tweets from the accounts of the five top politicians. It includes every tweet since 1 January 2017.

WHAT
The advent of social media has taken political insults to a whole new level. From Rahul Gandhi being a 'pappu' to chowkidar chor hai' campaign against Modi, Twitter is the battleground of wt.

WHAT

Indian politicians understand that sense of humour, sarcasm or name-calling has a wider reach, and more likes online mean more votes. The BIP's 'Rahul's pappu' campaign is the biggest example.

WHAT

From being the subject of insults, 'pappu' has transformed himself into the master of insults on Twitter. The election results will tell us if gabbar singh tax will turn into votes for the shehzada.

tially crafted via hand Twitter greetings and birthday wishes, much before an "anti-BJP alliance" became a publicly stated political goal. The firebrand Bengal leader exchanged online pleasantries with many politicians, from Omar Akbari to M.K. Stalin, through 2017 and 2018.

However, being an Hindi-speaking leader has its downsides. Mamata has been pushed to tweet far more in English than Bangla (see chart 3), denting the projection of an online persona which is closer to her aggressive, street fighter image. The Mamata on Twitter is a far cry from the Mamata in real life, although, even online, her issues have been largely the same.

Bengal is one of her favorite topics.

Unlike Mamata, Akhilesh has turned almost entirely inward, with 1 star Prajash-centric issues calling his attention. Spanning 1.1 until mid-2017, he had very little confrontational posturing, but the proportion of antagonistic tweeting increased dramatically around late 2017—uncannily mirroring Rahul Gandhi. Something clearly changed in the political hawa in the run-up to the Gujarat polls December 2017. Akhilesh who also largely tweeted in English till 2016 now relies almost exclusively on Hindi (see chart 3).

Unlike Rahul Gandhi and Amit Shah, whose antagonistic tweeting look much more significantly towards name-calling.

Akhilesh uses a quirky 'Lucknowi' style of sarcasm, humour, and rhyme in his political attacks. Of all the politicians Akhilesh is the most adept at metaphor and turns of phrase. In short, language and style are central to the public image of Akhilesh Yadav. As a火情 spread across India, Akhilesh has emerged as a key oppositional voice in the Twittersphere.

But the biggest beneficiary of online confrontation remains Rahul Gandhi, whose reach and virality have skyrocketed since the winter of 2017. Three significant findings emerge from a temporal analysis of Gandhi's tweets. First, Rahul consistently gets more replies to his tweets than most other politicians and most of them tend to be from detractors. In short, while his messages are more viral, there is also a much more aggressive countering of his messages through direct replies.

WHAT

Second, Rahul hardly has tweets since last year have been highly confrontational. This period also overlapped with the highest jump in retweet rates for Rahul, and the data clearly suggests antagonistic tweeting has more reach. Finally, Rahul's anti-BJP message mostly focuses on corruption. This is distinct from Mamata, for instance, whose attacks on the BIP are relatively more about state rights and federalism.

On the BIP side, interestingly, both Amit Shah and Narendra Modi are far less likely to use confrontational language than the other three leaders. In no given quarter since early 2017 has Modiji confronted an online attack, nor has he received a single tweet of all tweets. The BIP's online army of volunteers takes up a significant burden of the insult campaign, freeing up key leaders of the responsibility and offering plausible deniability.

But when Amit Shah does launch an online attack, it offers important insights into broader party strategy. In the run-up to the 2019 elections, the state leaders Shah and especially Amit Shah and Bengal chief minister Nabendu Patnaik and Mamata Banerjee, not Akhilesh Yadav or Bahujan Samaj Party chief Mayawati.

IN CONCLUSION
Insult and antagonistic exchanges have unfortunately become central to the electoral process. It does seem like Rahul Gandhi has picked up at least two important lessons from 2014: insults like "pappu" have immense power and corruption is a salable political issue. The "online war" of 2019 is likely to be an extension of these lessons.

A pool of 8.4 million tweets since January 2019 from the accounts of 1,531 known politicians shows Congress attacks have heavily relied on the theme of corruption. The BIP, on the other hand, has made a decisive shift toward national security and cultural issues, a far cry from the "villas" discourse of 2014. On 23 May, we will know which approach worked.

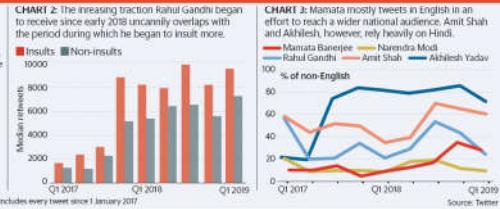

Ultimately, social media will not dictate the outcome of the election. That said, the online narrative war is here to stay. The new election post 23 May will have a short honeymoon and many vocal critics.

Andre Goncalves, Anmol Panda, Ramarao K.M., and Ajai Srivastava contributed to this story.

CHART 2: The increasing traction Rahul Gandhi began to receive since early 2018 uncannily overlaps with the period during which he began to insult more.

CHART 3: Rahul Gandhi discovered an edgy, new side in late-2017. In the months since, nearly half of his tweets have included insulting or confrontational language.

PARAS JAIN/MINT